who was about the only able-bodied man on the island who did not participate. It was decidedly a go-as-you-please-race, every man selecting his route to the sea by the circuitous paths or directly over the face of the cliff, and many fatal falls are recorded as the result.

The swim to Motu Kau Kau was a trifling matter, the chief difficulty being to return with an egg unbroken through the general scramble.

The hopu swam over to the island, supported by big bundles of reeds used as floats (pora). Carefully wrapped in the mats of the pora were provisions of all sorts which were "still hot when they landed on Motu-nui." To cross the 2 kilometers between the main island and Motu-nui was not an easy sport. The waves are generally high and often sharks haunt these waters.

On the islet, the hopu were provided with food which was cooked by the people gathered at Orongo and taken over to the island by servants who used pora for transportation. When the weather was stormy communications between Motu-nui and the main island ceased. Those who were provident dried banana and sweet potato skins in the sun to be eaten in case of emergency.

Whilst the hopu waited on the islet for the first manu-tara eggs, their masters and the members of the ao performed various rites at Orongo to propitiate the gods. Dances were held in front of the houses, and chants were sung for the gods by the rongorongo who occupied the houses at the end of the stone village, near the carved rocks. The dual political division of the island was reflected even in the abodes of the narrators during the feast. Those from Hotu-iti dwelt in the western group of houses, and those from Tuu in the houses to the east. Sometimes the king went to Mataveri to call on the people gathered there, but he never ascended to Orongo. At least that was the custom adopted by Nga-ara who was probably following an old tradition. Offerings and prayers were addressed to the gods Makemake and Haua who had created the birds and established the cult in honor of themselves. Makemake designated the man to be tangata-manu and thus incarnate the god. Routledge (194, p. 260) mentions vie Hoa and vie Kenatea among the deities who were worshipped at Orongo.

Tepano stated repeatedly that at Orongo there were many old men (koro-hua) who were sorcerers; they recited charms for the success of the competitors and had long talks with the gods, who entered some of the houses of Orongo. When a god was thought to be in a house, only the priest could enter and inquire about the contestant's chances of winning. While the priests tried to make the deities favorable toward those who resorted to them (hatu o te manu kia Haua, kia kia Makemake), the young people were busy making earth ovens, the contents of which they distributed lavishly among the priests or sent to the hopu on the island. Some of the food was set apart by the ivi-atua and consecrated to the gods with the traditional formula, "Ka too ma Haua, ma Makemake . . . " Tepano's reference to the sharp voices of the priests when they spoke to the gods is probably a personal memory of some
